

Robert W. Wood

THE TAX LAWYER

TAXES 06/25/2018

Emotional Distress Damages Are Taxable, Physical Sickness Damages Are Not, How Come?

The tax treatment of litigation damages is varied and complex. But the rule for compensatory damages for personal physical injuries is supposed to be easy. They are tax free under Section 104 of the tax code. Yet exactly what is "physical" isn't so clear. Some of it seems to be semantics. If you make claims for emotional distress, your damages are taxable. If you claim the defendant caused you to become physically sick, those can be tax free. If emotional distress causes you to be physically sick, that is taxable. The order of events and how you describe them matters to the IRS.

If you are physically sick or physically injured, and your sickness or injury produces emotional distress, those emotional distress damages should be tax free. Much of this seems artificial, but wording is important. These lines are hard to draw, and can sometimes seem contrived. Some of the line-drawing comes from a footnote in the legislative history to the tax code adding the 'physical' requirement. It says "emotional distress" includes physical symptoms, such as insomnia, headaches, and stomach disorders, which may result from such emotional distress. See H. Conf. Rept. 104-737, at 301 n. 56 (1996).

All compensatory damages flowing from a physical injury or physical sickness are excludable from income. Even in employment cases, some plaintiffs win on the tax front. For example, in Domeny v. Commissioner, Ms. Domeny suffered from multiple sclerosis ("MS"). Her MS got worse because of workplace problems, including an embezzling employer. As her symptoms worsened, her physician determined that she was too ill to work. Her employer terminated her, causing another spike in her MS symptoms. She settled her employment case and claimed some of the money as tax free. The IRS disagreed, but Ms. Domeny won in Tax Court. Her health and physical condition clearly worsened because of her employer's actions, so portions of her settlement were tax free.

In Parkinson v. Commissioner, a man suffered a heart attack while at work. He reduced his hours, took medical leave, and never returned. He filed suit under the Americans with Disabilities Act ("ADA"), claiming that his employer failed to accommodate his severe coronary artery disease. He lost his ADA suit, but then sued in state court for intentional infliction and invasion of privacy. His complaint alleged that the employer's misconduct caused him to suffer a disabling heart attack at work, rendering him unable to work. He settled and claimed that one payment was tax free. When the IRS disagreed, he went to Tax Court. He argued the payment was for physical injuries and physical sickness brought on by extreme emotional distress. The IRS said that it was just a taxable emotional distress recovery.

The Tax Court said damages received on account of emotional distress attributable to physical injury or physical sickness are tax free. The court distinguished between a "symptom" and a "sign." The court called a symptom a "subjective evidence of disease of a patient's condition." In contrast, a "sign" is evidence perceptible to the examining physician. The Tax Court said the IRS was wrong to argue that one can never have physical injury or physical sickness in a claim for emotional distress. The court said intentional infliction of emotional distress can result in bodily harm.

Notably, the settlement agreement in Parkinson was not specific about the nature of the payment or its tax treatment. And it did not say anything about tax reporting. There was little evidence that medical testimony linked Parkinson's condition to the actions of the employer. Still, Parkinson beat the IRS. Damages for physical symptoms of emotional distress (headaches, insomnia, and stomachaches) might be taxable. Yet physical symptoms of emotional distress have a limit. For example, ulcers, shingles, aneurysms, and strokes may all be an outgrowth of stress. It seems difficult to regard them all as 'mere symptoms of emotional distress.' Extreme emotional distress can produce a heart attack, which is not a symptom of emotional distress. The Tax Court in Parkinson agreed.

Medical records and settlement agreement language can help materially. With the right combination, you may be able to resolve an IRS query or audit. To exclude a payment from income on account of physical sickness, the taxpayer needs evidence he made the claim. He does not necessarily have to prove that the defendant caused the sickness. But he needs to show he claimed it. In addition, he needs to show the defendant was aware of the claim, and at least considered it in making payment. To prove physical sickness, the taxpayer should have evidence of medical care, and evidence that he actually claimed the defendant caused or exacerbated his condition. This is one of many issues in the Taxation of Damage Awards and Settlement Payments.

The more medical evidence the better. Moreover, if there is a scant record of medical expenses in the litigation, consider what you can collect at settlement time. A declaration from the plaintiff will help for the file. A declaration from a treating physician or an expert physician is appropriate, as is one from the plaintiff's attorney. Prepare what you can at the time of settlement or, at the latest, at tax return time. Do as much as you can contemporaneously. Support that you gather later is rarely as helpful.

And then there is the settlement agreement. Whenever possible, settlement agreements should be specific about taxes. The IRS is likely to view everything as income unless you can prove otherwise. Try to be explicit in the settlement agreement about tax forms too. You don't want to be surprised by IRS Forms W-2 and 1099 arriving unexpectedly in January the year after the settlement. For a current snapshot of settlement taxes, see Settlement Awards Post-TCJA.

For alerts to future tax articles, email me at Wood@WoodLLP.com. This discussion is not legal advice.