Accusations of sexual abuse have devastated the Catholic Church for more than a few years.\(^1\) Apart from moral and religious affects—and pure human suffering—the amount of money at issue has risen to near biblical proportions. The Catholic Church has paid over a half billion dollars in settlements throughout the country.\(^2\) One of the most widely publicized of these settlements occurred in the Boston Archdiocese, where the Catholic Church paid a reported $85 million to sex abuse victims.\(^3\)

The tax consequences of these settlements may not be at the forefront of anyone’s mind in this tragic tapestry. Nevertheless, the increasing prevalence of such settlements, and their sheer magnitude, suggests that there will be tax cases arising out of them. Because of the atrocious nature of these cases, there is an argument that Congress or the IRS should treat these settlements differently. The IRS should recognize the unique circumstances brought about by this tragedy and alleviate the uncertainty in the taxation of these settlement payments. Obviously, Congress should consider clarifying legislation with respect to the taxation of these settlement payments.

Following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the IRS provided special relief for victims of these attacks.\(^4\) In 2003, the IRS even issued a Revenue Ruling determining that certain payments relating to the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks are excludable under Section 104(a)(2).\(^5\) The IRS should follow a similar path with respect to the Catholic Church sex abuse scandal. Yet, for now at least, we must assume a traditional tax analysis will apply to these settlements.

Dogged By A Seemingly Unending String Of Controversies

It is axiomatic that, Section 104(a)(2) provides an exclusion from gross income for recoveries made on account of personal physical injuries or physical sickness. Prior to August 20, 1996, no physical injury or physical sickness was required for recoveries to be excludable under Section 104(a)(2). Before 1996, Section 104(a)(2) merely required that recoveries be received on account of personal injuries or sickness. The 1996 amendments to Section 104(a)(2) were not voluminous. In fact, only a few words were added, but those words have turned out to be significant.

Unfortunately, nowhere in the Internal Revenue Code, or the accompanying Treasury Regulations, is the meaning of the term “physical injuries or physical sickness” defined. Even the legislative history to the 1996 amendments to Section 104(a)(2) is less than helpful. Given the importance of the term, it is reasonable to assume that the Service, or perhaps the judiciary, would provide guidance on the meaning of “physical injuries or physical sickness”.

At a minimum, you would like to think that the Service might issue Proposed or Temporary Regulations (or maybe even an IRS Notice or Announcement, which are easier to issue than Regulations). Anything written by the IRS would offer only an IRS statement of its view of what constitutes physical injuries or physical sickness. Still, guidance is needed.

Most tax practitioners are frustrated that the IRS has been all-but-silent as to exactly what constitutes physical injuries or physical sickness. As in other grey areas of the tax law, taxpayers are entitled to read the statute and the legislative history to attempt to achieve a favorable result. Of course, this reading is not without limits, and it carries inherent risks. Attempting to divine Congressional intent and the Service’s interpretation of the law can be tricky business.

The lack of guidance in this area of the tax law has allowed some taxpayers to take positions that are in a word—aggressive. It is inefficient and risky for taxpayers to go too far. On the other hand, it is also inefficient to fail to claim and exclusion if one is entitled to it. We know very little about the Service’s true thoughts on the meaning of the term “physical injuries or physical sickness”. This suggests that any rule, even a harsh one, is better than no rule at all.

Lessons From The Trenches

Private Letter Rulings cannot be relied upon by anyone other than the requesting taxpayer.\(^6\) Just to make sure everyone knows this, a disclaimer is emblazoned on every Private Letter Ruling issued by the Service. It is not surprising that many courts have refused to consider Private Letter Rulings as any form of precedent.\(^7\)

However, the Supreme Court has at times found Private Letter Rulings to have some precedential value. In Hanover Bank v. Commissioner,\(^8\) the Court found that Private Letter Rulings “reveal the interpretation put upon the statute” by the IRS. Admittedly, this decision predates the enactment of Section 6110 as part of the Tax Reform Act of 1976, and it certainly cannot be cited as standing for the proposition that Private Letter Rulings may be used as precedent, notwithstanding Section 6110(k)(3). Even so, in Rowan Cos., Inc. v. United States,\(^9\) the Court actually cited several Private Letter Rulings as an indication that the IRS had regularly considered and issued rulings on a particular subject. Id. at 261.

Of course, most taxpayers do not want to apply for a Private Letter Ruling unless they are almost sure they will achieve a favorable result. For one thing, they are expensive. Second, they take time, often many months. But even if one is willing to endure the expense and delay, there is the problem of certainty.
In most areas where there is some controversy, as there is with the tax consequences of sexual molestation, Private Letter Rulings are simply impractical. In part, this is because the IRS does not want to go out on a limb. It's also in part a result of taxpayers not wanting to "give away the farm," so to speak, and potentially expose themselves to additional tax liabilities by asking a question to which they may not know the answer. It seems paradoxical, but taxpayers do not typically ask for a Private Letter Ruling unless they know how the IRS will rule before the ruling request is submitted. Do not ask a question, an old adage professes, if you cannot stand the answer.

Even where the IRS is not going to give the taxpayer the desired ruling for one reason or another, it is customary for the Service to notify the taxpayer before actually issuing an adverse ruling. This inevitably leads to the ruling request being withdrawn by the taxpayer, but the damage may already be done. The taxpayer's identity has been revealed in the ruling request process. Plus, the local IRS field office will frequently (if not always) be notified of a ruling request withdrawal. This puts the taxpayer in the unenviable position of being potentially subjected to increased IRS scrutiny.

The "Bruise" Ruling

Despite all their caveats, tax practitioners still look to Private Letter Rulings for guidance as to the Service's general position on matters. Unfortunately, such as in the case of attempting to divine the meaning of the term "physical injuries or physical sickness," Private Letter Rulings may be the only real guidance available to tax practitioners. Private Letter Ruling 200041022 deals with the difficult topic of a taxpayer who receives damages for sexual harassment and assault, both before and after there is any observable bodily harm. This Private Letter Ruling concludes that the damages a taxpayer received that were allocable to unwanted physical contacts without any "observable bodily harm" did not constitute "physical injury or physical sickness" for purposes of Section 104(a)(2).

The ruling goes so far as to say: "The term 'personal physical injuries' is not defined in either Section 104(a)(2) or the legislative history of the 1996 Act. However, direct unwanted or uninvited physical contacts resulting in observable bodily harms such as bruises, cuts, swelling, and bleeding are personal physical injuries under Section 104(a)(2)." This line of reasoning might prove to be disastrous in the case of the Catholic Church sex abuse victims. Conceivably, it could result in sex abuse victims who were sexually assaulted, but suffered no bruises, cuts, swelling, or bleeding, being taxed on their recoveries. Given the horrendous nature of this abuse, this result seems exceptionally unjust.

The facts in Private Letter Ruling 200041022 are reminiscent of many sexual harassment cases. The taxpayer was employed as a full-time driver. Her employer began making suggestive and lewd remarks to her, and also began touching her inappropriately. According to the ruling, those physical contacts did not leave any "observable bodily harm". However, while the taxpayer was on one road trip with her employer, he physically assaulted her, causing her extreme pain. The employer also assaulted her on other occasions, causing physical injury. He later physically and sexually assaulted her.

The taxpayer quit her job and filed a suit alleging sex discrimination and reprisal (including sexual harassment), battery, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The employer settled the case, but there was no express allocation of the proceeds in the settlement agreement. Clearly, this was less than ideal planning from a tax perspective. Always allocate—it's just that simple. At least then you have a fighting chance.

Under these facts, the Service concluded that the damages the taxpayer received from her employer's unwanted physical contacts which did not result in any observable bodily harm were not received on account of personal physical injuries or physical sickness. These amounts were, therefore, taxable. However, the damages received for pain, suffering, emotional distress, and reimbursement of medical expenses after the first assault were excludable under Section 104(a)(2) because they were attributable to physical injuries.

The exact amount and extent of physical consequences required under the post-1996 incarnation of Section 104(a)(2) have been enigmas for almost a decade. For example, in Johnson v. United States, a guard at a juvenile detention center who suffered injuries while restraining an inmate was not permitted to exclude damages he recovered in a suit brought under the Americans With Disabilities Act after his employer failed to accommodate his physical limitations which resulted from the incident. The court found that Johnson's recovery was on account of unlawful termination rather than personal physical injuries.

Over the years, the government's line drawing exercises in this area of the tax law have at times been difficult to follow. It's certainly clear that "but for" the incident with the inmate ("but for" being a traditional tort causation index), Johnson would not have suffered the injuries which ultimately resulted in his recovery. Nonetheless, the court was not convinced, and it sided with the Service.

Returning briefly to Private Letter Ruling 200041022, it is fair—and perhaps even right, to use moral terminology—to question how the government could engage in such precise line drawing between various incidents of sexual harassment and assault. Admittedly, it is possible to discern between the various incidents of sexual harassment and touching that left no "observable bodily harm," and the various assaults that began with what the Service termed the "first pain incident". Nonetheless, this type of line drawing seems akin to splitting hairs with a machete.
sex scandal could produce harsh, unjust (and potentially irreconcilable) results.

The Good, The Bad, And The Ugly

Almost a decade after Section 104(a)(2) was amended to exclude from gross income only recoveries for personal physical injuries or physical sickness, tax practitioners still know very little about what constitutes personal physical injuries or physical sickness. It is difficult to say, based on established case law or administrative guidance at least, whether the recoveries by the Catholic Church sex abuse victims constitute amounts received on account of personal physical injuries or physical sickness. If no portion of these recoveries is found to be paid on account of personal physical injuries or physical sickness, the recoveries would be fully taxable to the victims, including any amounts paid for emotional distress, and possibly even including amounts paid to their attorneys.

Yet, should it matter if there are demonstrable bruises or scratches? I don’t think it should. In fact, it seems ludicrous to think that damages resulting from invasive intentional physical maltreatment, and the corresponding (often life-long) resulting emotional injuries, are not paid “on account of personal physical injuries or physical sickness” merely because visible bruises (or no bruises remaining after years of hiding the appalling incidents) may be absent. This makes no sense, given the purpose of Section 104, even after the 1996 amendments to it.

It leads many people to conclude that such payments should be fully excludable. Scars on the inside resulting from physical trauma may well be more debilitating than those on the outside. It is important to remember what Congress attempted to curtail with its 1996 amendments to Section 104(a)(2)—primarily plaintiffs claiming the exclusion for recoveries in employment litigation, which did not result in physical injuries or physical sickness. The rationale behind making these amendments was that only those who have truly suffered a loss of “human capital” should be able to exclude their recovery under Section 104(a)(2).

With that as our backdrop, can anyone in their right mind compare a run-of-the-mill discrimination case to a case of sexual molestation or abuse? Bear in mind too that Section 104 contains no explicit touching (or physical contact) requirement. The Service may prefer to read one in, but it is not in the statute.

Lost In Translation

The Circuit Courts of Appeal do not agree on the tax treatment of contingent attorneys’ fees. Everybody knows the decisions, and even the underlying rationales, of the Circuit Courts of Appeal on this issue are incredibly inconsistent.12

The majority has held that contingent attorneys’ fees are taxable to both the attorney and the plaintiff.13

The minority has held that contingent attorneys’ fees are not taxable to the plaintiff; instead, they are merely taxable to the attorney.14

On March 29, 2004, the Supreme Court decided to resolve the split in the Circuit Courts of Appeal on the tax treatment of contingent attorneys’ fees, granting certiorari petitions in Banaitis v. Commissioner15 and Banks v. Commissioner.16

Prior to granting certiorari in Banks and Banaitis, the Supreme Court declined to resolve the attorneys’ fee issue on five prior occasions.17 I can only hope that the Court sides with taxpayers, but, our fear is that this result is unlikely.

Adding Insult To Injury

It’s probably unlikely that many of the victims of the Catholic Church sex abuse scandal have contemplated that on top of their trauma, they may have staggering tax consequences too. As a matter of fact, there have even been cases where taxpayers have ended up out-of-pocket on an after-tax basis after ostensibly “winning” a lawsuit.18

This Alice-in-Wonderland-like result (or perhaps Friday the Thirteenth?) occurs because of the AMT. Let’s see how this might work where a disproportionately small settlement payment is recovered along with a substantial amount of attorneys’ fees.

Assume a victim of the Catholic Church sex scandal recovers $5 million in a settlement, inclusive of attorneys’ fees. Assume further that the recovery is found to be taxable because it fails to qualify as being received on account of personal physical injuries or physical sickness. If the victim lives in one of the majority jurisdictions, and is required to recognize the gross amount (including the attorneys’ fees), he or she will be taxed on the entire $5 million recovery. Of course, the victim may be entitled to a miscellaneous itemized deduction for the amount of the recovered attorneys’ fees (assume $4 million). But, this deduction is disallowed entirely for AMT purposes (and also subject to a two-percent-of-AGI floor and phase-out for regular tax purposes).

This results in the victim owing just shy of $1.4M in federal income tax on the recovery. Of this amount, just shy of $1M stems from the AMT. The appalling result here is that the victim will actually end up losing almost $400,000 because of this “recovery”! That’s right, the victim will actually end up in the hole almost $400,000 after an ostensibly “successful” settlement!

While the victim is allocated $1.4M in gross income, he or she actually receives only $1M in cash. From a cash-flow standpoint, the victim is left with roughly a $1.4M tax bill and only $1M with which to pay it. It does not seem fair to receive a favorable settlement and then end up paying more in federal income tax than you recovered.

The saddest part about this unjust tax result is that virtually everyone knows about it, and has known about it for years; nonetheless, nobody has yet been willing to do anything to resolve it.19 All of this will undoubtedly provide very little solace to victims of the Catholic Church sex scandal if the payments made to them are not found to have been made on account of physical injuries or physical sickness. Hopefully, the Service will realize that the victims of the Catholic Church sex abuse scandal have endured enough without being burdened with an unexpected tax bill.
